

When the base case is reached, the function returns its value to the function by whom it is called and memory is de-allocated and the process continues.

How memory is allocated to different function calls in recursion?

The recursive program has greater space requirements than the iterative program as all functions will remain in the stack until the base case is reached. It also has greater time requirements because of function calls and returns overhead.